

Apple promises to update iWork to 'add great features'

Many users complained that the iWork version released last month lacks many features inherent on older versions.

Many users complained that the iWork version released last month lacks many features inherent on older versions.

After Apple announced iWork last month, many users complained that new applications in the toolkit lacked many key features and were no longer as powerful. Apple also seems to recognize that these responses are true, and the company has just promised to release an update for iWork in the near future to add missing features. The time that the company promised to update for iWork was " within 6 months ". Apple promises to add customization to the toolbar, better AppleScript support. Users can view all new features on the Apple website.

Apple introduced new iWork for both OS X and iOS last month. The newly redesigned iWork takes advantage of the power of the new 64-bit chip they use on iPhone and iPad. In addition to promising to upgrade iWork in the future, Apple noted that users can return to using iWork '09 temporarily, the version still has missing features on the latest iWork. Users can find this version of iWork in Applications > iWork '09.

You finished reading the article "Apple promises to update iWork to 'add great features'" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.