

Call of Duty Black Ops 6 will feature 'Human Shield'

Call of Duty: Black Ops 6 is the sequel to the COD Black Ops series in particular and Call of Duty in general.

Even though Call of Duty: Black Ops 6 is still a few months away, information about the latest installment of the COD series has already begun to appear online. A latest leak shows what the "human shield" mechanic will look like when performed on another player.

COD Black Ops 6 "human shield" mechanism

When players sneak behind an enemy, they can use the enemy as a "human shield" instead of automatically performing a quick kill. When using someone as a human shield, the player will pull out a handgun and use it to attack other players.

Once the player has captured someone, they can also kill the enemy. The player can perform a "Quick Kill", meaning the enemy will be destroyed immediately, and they also have the opportunity to perform this quick attack of their own.

Based on information provided by user CharlieIntel on social network X clip, it seems that players chosen as shields will still be alive throughout this control process. But if the "human shield" user dies before the enemy dies, the controlled player will return to the match. So you can still save your teammates if you aim correctly.

Until now, there has been a lot of leaked information about the latest part of Call of Duty. The reason is that there is a version of the title that was previously uploaded to the PSN database, allowing players to experience the beta version on PlayStation.
