

CES 2020: Dell unveils two foldable laptop models at the world's largest technology stage

CES 2020 is expected to become a stage for foldable devices, especially in the laptop segment.

CES 2020 is expected to become the catwalk of foldable devices, especially in the Laptop segment. However, the problems encountered in developing Windows 10X - the operating system exclusively for folding / dual-screen laptops - has led to the unfortunate absence of many big names.

Fortunately, Dell is still able to bring to the event this year two brand new laptops named Dell Concept Ori and Dell Concept Duet with impressive design and many unique features.

The complete removal of the keyboard and trackpad to replace the touch screen is the biggest design in common between Dell Concept Ori and Dell Concept Duet, besides both still run on Windows 10 platform because Microsoft still not complete Windows 10X yet.

However, Dell Concept Duet can be considered a copy of Surface Neo, with a separate screen design, 13.3 inches, opposing the clamshell folding mechanism. These two screens can be operated in combination (displaying the same content as the big screen) or used separately in many different modes. In particular, Concept Duet can also be compatible with proprietary accessories from Dell, which works like a trackpad or traditional keyboard in case users are not familiar with working on a pure touch screen.

Meanwhile Dell Concept Ori will be priced in the higher-end segment with a 100% folding screen design, quite similar to the prototype folding screen laptop that Lenovo introduced last year - the Thinkpad X1 Fold. The device has a 13.4-inch P-OLED screen, which can be folded 180 degrees in the form of a clamshell. When working in folding mode, the bottom screen can be used as a touch keyboard with trackpad. Actual experience shows this panel for great visibility, although a fuzzy fold can still be seen in the center of the screen.

Dell has not yet announced the configuration information, price as well as the official launch time of these two unique laptops. However, a representative of the company said that Dell Concept Duet will likely be launched soon, probably later this year. While Concept Ori is a more experimental product.
