

Facebook tests the ability to temporarily turn off notifications from friends on the News Feed

You feel very frustrated when many friends post news you don't care about, making them always on News Feed? Don't worry, Facebook is about to launch a new feature to help you solve that.

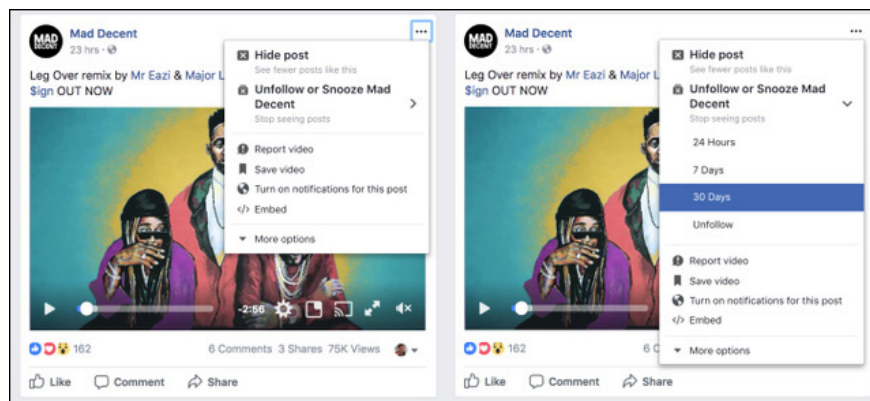

You feel very frustrated when many friends post news you don't care about, making them always on News Feed? Don't worry, Facebook is about to launch a new feature to help you solve that.

Currently, Facebook is testing a feature called Snooze that allows users to temporarily "unfollow" a certain person, group or page within 24 hours, a week and even 30 days.

This feature is currently only tested with a small number of users. It appears in the "." icon on the right side of the post. When you click on it and select "Unfollow or Snooze", you will pause to follow someone. This is a progressive feature besides the two "Unfollow" and "Hide post" features that are known to many users.

1. How to chat typeface in Facebook Messenger
2. How to change DNS to access Facebook faster

Facebook spokesman said: We are testing new features that help users control their News Feed and read the news they care about most.

Once again, Facebook gives users new features - helping you get rid of your annoying annoying friends without having to unfriend them forever.

Hopefully this feature of Facebook will soon be widely deployed to all users.

You finished reading the article "Facebook tests the ability to temporarily turn off notifications from friends on the News Feed" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.

