

Google Drive is integrated into Windows 8

The new Google service will be integrated by default into the beta version of Windows 8 released in early June.

The new Google service will be integrated by default into the beta version of Windows 8 released in early June.

Cooperation is a step to "placate" each other between the two companies. (Photo: Slashgear).

The Windows 8 release in early June may be bundled with the "search giant" Google Drive cloud service. It seems that the "bosses" of the technology village are trying to test before deciding to integrate the service into the official Windows version.

This move is considered to be a pleasing step for Google by Google. In the last few years, the two companies have faced many disagreements in some business areas, especially since Microsoft launched search and Bing maps (direct competitors of Google and Gmaps). The test decision also opens up the possibility that Google Docs applications will be integrated with Windows Phone in the near future.

Windows 8 will release Release Preview in early June, which is a preview version. Currently, Microsoft is also running a trial version of Consumer Preview with certain bugs. The new operating system works with touch-screen devices, in addition to traditional products like PCs or laptops.

You finished reading the article "Google Drive is integrated into Windows 8" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.