

Google Meet is free until September

Seeing the explosive growth of Zoom in recent years due to the Covid-19 pandemic, Google decided to make its Google Meet platform free for everyone.

According to Android Authority, Google has announced it will free Meet for everyone in the next few weeks. Before, Meet was limited as a productivity solution of G Suite for businesses and schools.

'Starting in early May, anyone with an email address can sign up for Meet and enjoy many of the same features available to our business and educational users, such as simple scheduling, and screen sharing, real-time annotation and adaptive layout options,' Google explained.

Google notes that meetings are limited to 60 minutes when using Meet for free, but this limit will not exist from now until September 30.

For G Suite users, they have access to Meet's advanced features such as live streaming to 100,000 viewers in one session, at least from now until September 30.

The search giant has also invited some interesting usage statistics for Meet, with an additional 3 million users per day. Google says it has seen its highest daily usage increase 30 times since January, as well as 100 million people attending daily meetings.

You finished reading the article "Google Meet is free until September" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.