

Hackers claim how good it is to hack Mark Zuckerberg's Facebook account?

Chang Chiu graduated from Taiwan National University and made money by exploiting programming and security errors from many technology corporations to receive bonuses.

On September 28, a Taiwanese freelance programmer named Chang Chi-yuan, posted a livestream plan to direct the process of completely eliminating the account of Mark Zuckerberg, CEO Facebook made many people not from amazement and delight. Unfortunately, not long after, this guy changed his plan, instead of hack Chang reported the error to Facebook to receive the bonus.

Chang Chiu graduated from Taiwan National University and made money by exploiting programming and security errors from many technology corporations to receive bonuses. Two years ago, this white-hat hacker had discovered a serious error that could potentially remove a Facebook account quickly and get a $ 30,000 reward from Facebook. In 2016, Chang's personal account was ranked among Top Corp.'s Top 8 programmers with the highest security error.

Chang Chi-yuan has discovered many web holes and received bonuses from many technology corporations in the US and India. Previously, this guy was also accused of breaking into the system of Apple or Tesla.

In his locality, Chang was sued by a bus company for hacking into their system to lower the ticket price to only NT $ 1 (NT), equivalent to 3 cents and paying $ 60,000 in compensation.

Facebook and many large technology corporations often have a bonus program that rewards a large amount of money to anyone who finds a vulnerability on their platform. But provocative acts like Chang's high-level personnel account hacking are definitely not welcome by any technology group.

In 2013, Khalil Shreateh, an IT specialist, successfully hacked Zuckerberg's account, then posted a status with Facebook's own account. And of course, Facebook has refused to reward the discovery of the vulnerability.
