

How to backup the copyright of installed software on Windows

Normally, after reinstalling Windows, you will have to go through the steps of installing commonly used software. And if you often use high-end software, you will have to go through the software license activation stage.

In case the copyright is linked to an email account, the activation is quite simple, but if the software uses an activation code, it will be difficult to remember or find it again, right?

The code used to activate the software license is often very long and difficult to remember. Normally, software license activation codes are usually sent to your email when you pay, however, not everyone saves these codes to use when needed.

In order to avoid having to spend time searching for the license activation code, you can use the XenArmor All-in-One Key Finder Pro software to backup the copyright information of the "genuine" software installed on the computer, including the license key of Windows currently in use. Then use it for reinstalling Windows or using it on another computer. As follows.
