

How to collect and boil water in Green Hell

Green Hell is a challenging survival game that gives players the experience of surviving alone in the wilderness.

In particular, the game does not instruct or train how to survive in harsh environments, which players will have to learn on their own.

Like most other survival games, gamers need to maintain their water intake, but also have to worry about bacteria and parasites in the water. Players will not last long if they drink water straight from the river.

In this article, let's learn how to collect and boil water in Green Hell so you don't get killed by bacteria.

Get water in the early stages of Green Hell

The key to having water in the early game is the coconut. They are a source of naturally regenerated clean water. However, some work has to be done to get the coconut water.

Originally, Green Hell's coconuts were not brown and hairy. Just like in real life, the coconut will initially be green when on the tree. After selecting them, the player needs a stone ax or ax to cut off the outer layer and reach the brown core. From there, the player can drink coconut water, worth 15 water points.

The uses of coconut do not end there. After drinking all the water inside, gamers can take out the ax to smash it to harvest the edible copra and 2 halves of the shell.

Using those halves or combining them with a rope to form a pitcher of water called a bidon, the player can draw water from rivers and other wild sources. From there, if you place coconut shells filled with water over an active fire, it will boil them, remove bacteria, and be safe to drink.

Get water at the end of the game

The above method is quite complicated and labor-intensive, so fortunately it can be automated when gamers know more about the crafting recipes in Green Hell.

The player can set up a water collector, which collects rainwater into a container over time with the following formula:

1. 4 long bars
2. 4 sticks
3. 4 strings
4. 11 banana leaves

People can replace long wooden sticks with bamboo sticks, long bamboo sticks to form an identical bamboo collection.

The second option is to create a water filter, which allows the player to purify the water without having to build a fire and wait for it to boil. To make a water filter, gamers need to prepare:

1. 2 long bars
2. 1 bamboo stick
3. 2 strings
4. 3 charcoal
5. 2 stones

Like the water collector, the long wooden slats can be replaced by long bamboo slats. However, bamboo sticks are still needed for both recipes.

You finished reading the article "How to collect and boil water in Green Hell" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.