Flexible, long, thin cat whiskers grow on the sides of the mouth, under the jaw, above the eyes and back of the front legs. They are about two to three times thicker than normal hairs. A cat has about 12 antennae on each side of the mouth, but some individuals have more numbers.

Cat's beard 'plugs' deep into the face in the area with many blood vessels and nerves. They are very sensitive and help the cat determine the distance and direction of a specific object so that it can move easily even at night.

Specifically, cat whiskers make it possible to run comfortably indoors at night without touching objects. Depending on the location of the furniture, the air flow in the room changes. The top part of the beard is the sensory organ that senses the change in the air around the object to help the cat turn to the other side to avoid collision.

An interesting feature you can check right away with your pet cat is the distance between the two stubble right as the cat's body width. They use this feature to see if they can squeeze through narrow spaces in front of them.

Cat's whiskers can reveal their mood. When the cat pulls the beard towards the cheek, they may be scared or angry. When the mustache is comfortable, they are happy. When a cat is prone to prey or is in a positive state, its antennae will face forward and stretch.

Just like feathers, the cat's mustache will fall off and will grow back like a natural cycle.
