Since Google launched a new security policy a few months ago, many users have become wary of services from Google. The article will show you how to delete your Google+ account without deleting account settings of other Google services.

TipsMake.com - Since Google introduced a new security policy a few months ago, many users become wary of services from Google. The article will show you how to delete your Google+ account without deleting account settings of other Google services.

Although many laws have been introduced, Google maintains changes that have been designed to make security easier.

Google has released many previous security policies and even has a comparison tool. Therefore, users can make their own decisions. But, this new policy seems to be more ambiguous and does not mention how long Google will retain user data, or whether it will delete user data.

If Google is no longer the company you trust, you can delete the entire account on Google. But, if you just want to stay away from Google+, just leave it alone without losing data from Gmail, Youtube and other services.

First of all, visit the Google Account page and log in, click on the profile picture and select Account or go to <https://www.google.com/settings/>.

On the next Google+ page, there are 2 options. First is the option to delete content on Google+ ( Delete Google+ content ).

The option allows you to remove most of the information that users put on Google+ but will not delete the information in the About section of the Google+ profile. The same thing happens for many other data related to users.

Note that no confirmation window is available. Once you've checked the request box and clicked the blue uninstall button, Google immediately removed all information.

If the user chooses to delete only Google+ content, the user's information will still appear publicly. Although much of the posted information will be deleted, there is no statement in Google's privacy policy or the data backup service terms that will exist on Google servers.

The other option is to delete all profile information in Google+.

This will completely remove the Google social network account, as well as Google Buzz and the user's public Google profile information. That's the way to do it if you want to permanently delete your account information. Users can still re-create a Google+ account later, but from the original starting line.

Note that if you created a Google+ account before creating a YouTube account, you can lose your YouTube account if it uses Google+ Identity to log in. As usual, no confirmation window will appear. Once the check box is checked, Google will delete the account immediately.
