Radioactive substances affect the western part of the Soviet Union and Europe, causing environmental and health problems for nearly 7 million people.

Beautiful Gavdos Island.

Among those affected by radiation, a number of scientists volunteered to come here to study. One of these is Andrei, a famous Russian nuclear physicist. In this desolate place, he was seriously ill. Realizing that, there is no effective remedy for radioactive sequelae, Andrei thinks of other ways to sustain life. Instead of going to Moscow for treatment as directed, he went to a village near Stavropol, Russia, led a simple life, worked hard for sweating and drank vodka, which, according to him, had a detoxifying effect. for body.

In particular, he focused on mystical measures with the purpose of extending life, toward immortality. Later, he gathered people of the same situation, including many Russian scientists. They began to study philosophy and esoteric theory to form a new direction of thinking.

Accordingly, working hard and maintaining a strong mind can change the body's ability. They believe that, with the power of will, meditation, eliminating the traditional ideas of life and death, we can basically reprogram the body to never die.

After 10 years, the team members increased to 30. They decided to find a place separate from the world to pursue their own way of life. And the island of Gavdos was discovered. This is a small island, about 30 km² in area, rising from the Lybia Sea, next to its bigger brother Crete.

There are still many legends and rumors that are hard to recognize. Norwegian filmmaker, Yiorgos Moustakis, made a documentary about the island and secret group here, saying: 'Many urban legends surround the group. Some thought they went to the island to treat radioactive infections. Others say they are spies of KGB or CIA '.

Their specific methods to achieve the purpose are unknown, but many believe that the ideology of the group is mixed with simple lifestyles, practicing mystical rituals, religious studies, esoteric philosophy and Scientific experiment. What they aim for is reprogramming the human body and achieving immortality.

For them, death is not inevitable, but can be stopped or stopped. A member of this community explained in an interview with Worldcrunch: 'The body is more likely to change that we don't use. Why? Because we have created for ourselves a way in which change is not necessary, with the notion that man who is born and dies is immutable law.

I used to work at a research center and saw the whole future in control, leading me to the last point of death. So I decided to change the process, not to follow that path, but to create a different path for my life. '

How did they achieve this? Many people try to find answers and even a few detectives have tried to infiltrate the group to discover what they are doing, but all failed. The filmmaker Moustakis believes that the group of most scientists who were not previously charlatans and fanatics and they know what they are doing. In other words, they certainly have a theoretical background to operate.

In the late 1990s, Andrei's group moved to the island. At that time, only a few people here lived on the fishing net. Deep inside, away from the neighborhood, they formed a subsistence community, cultivating food crops and other plants.

They also build mysterious laboratories and practice mystical rituals. They believe that it is possible to reach the next stage in human evolution, in which the longevity is possible.

One of the community members explained: 'There is no new generation in our community. We are the last generation. We do not produce people in the cycle of birth and death. They are not needed '.
