WhatsApp has promised to add voice calls to its application, and it seems that the company is about to fulfill that promise.

WhatsApp has promised nearly a year ago that it will be adding voice calls to its application. And recently, some leaked photos show that it seems that WhatsApp is gradually improving this feature to prepare for launch in the near future.

This "secret" was discovered by Sander Tuit users of AndroidWorld.nl when he unzipped the layout, image, and text files from the "raw" lines of the application stored on WhatsApp's website (version WhatsApp stored on this website is usually a version with experimental functions, and is updated more frequently than the version that is uploaded to the official application store).

The leaked image shows that the voice call interface on WhatsApp is quite simple. When a call comes in, tap the blue icon to listen; or if you do not want to listen to the phone, you can choose to reply to the message again (Whatsapp allows you to use text messages to reply). Another button allows you to connect to Bluetooth devices. Also, it is possible that WhatsApp will provide the feature to record the content of the call. WhatsApp once promised that the voice call function on its application will be introduced this year, so it is possible in the next few days we will see the calling function in an update of this application.
