Sarin is a powerful, colorless, odorless, tasteless liquid neurotoxin. Only a very small dose is enough to rob people of their lives. Sarin is classified by the United Nations as a weapon of mass destruction, the Chemical Weapons Agreement has banned the production and storage of sarin since 1993.

The name sarin is derived from the first letters of the names of chemists who accidentally discovered it: Schrader, Ambros, Ruediger et Van der Linde. Initially, the aim of these scientists was to create a stronger insecticide. But then the Nazi army used that chemical formula to produce chemical weapons with extreme destruction.

Sarin is very volatile so it can spread very quickly. If a person inhales or absorbs sarin through the skin, the victims have suffered extremely terrible feelings, which will paralyze the central nervous system's respiratory center and cause the muscles around the lungs. stop working.

According to the World Health Organization (WHO), sarin is 26 times more likely to kill people than cyanide, only a small needle with a needle can kill a person.

When first exposed to sarin, the victims will experience symptoms such as headache, blurred vision, nausea, drooling, convulsions, respiratory arrest and unconsciousness. If inhaled a high dose of about 200 milligrams of sarin can cause death in a few minutes, even without the time to develop symptoms.

If the victim is only exposed to the skin without inhaling this toxin, the disease will begin to appear after half an hour. Even if the survivors are lucky, they must suffer from permanent effects such as permanent damage to the lungs, eyes and central nervous system.

Due to being heavier than air, this poison can exist in an area for up to 6 hours, depending on weather conditions.

Fortunately, scientists have successfully prepared antidotes to reverse the effects of this terrible poison.
