Sony's mini laptop has appeared on its website with 3 colors red, gray and black and the configuration is much more powerful than traditional netbooks. However, only a few hours of this news was withdrawn.

The image is a screenshot of a product advertisement for the Sony Vaio P-series netbook. On the left, a large letter 'P' is followed by the text 'It fits in a pocket.' Below this, a bulleted list of specifications is provided: '1.33GHz Intel® processor', 'Genuine Microsoft® Windows Vista® Home Premium or Home Basic(32-bits)', '8" LED backlit 1600 x 768 display, x.xx lbs.', 'Up to 60GB hard drive, available 128GB SSD', 'Up to x-hour battery', and 'Starting at $NaN.00'. A red 'SHOP NOW' button is located at the bottom left of the text area. On the right, there is a photograph of the black netbook, which is open and shows the 'VAIO' logo on the lid. Below the photo, the text 'Available Colors:' is followed by three color swatches: red, gray, and black.

Not until January 9, yesterday Sony put on its official website the new "P-series" laptop, the device considered its netbook was rumored long ago.

The P-series represents a Sony mobile computer, which has an 8-inch screen, but ultra-high resolution, up to 1,600 x 768 pixels, LED backlit screen.

Sony's new laptop is equipped with a 60 GB to 128 GB hard drive. In particular, the 60 GB standard is a regular hard drive, and 128 GB is a solid-state SSD, the price will be very high if Sony uses this new storage standard. The Vaio P-series runs on an Intel 1.33 GHz processor, most likely the Atom Z520.

The first impression is that the P-series has no limited configuration with a traditional netbook. Moreover, it is possible that the price will be higher by high-end equipment. Maybe, the Japanese manufacturer will offer a mini laptop with a netbook design but the price will bring its own mark, expensive and classy.

After several hours of putting the P-series on the website, Sony pulled back. The company has yet to give an additional explanation or information about the new device.
