

Sophos alert for 'webcam trojans'

Security firm Sophos has warned of hackers using webcam spyware to steal sensitive information from victims' machines, then threaten them with information.

Security firm Sophos has warned of hackers using webcam spyware to steal sensitive information from victims' machines, then threaten them with information.

Adrian Ringland lived in Ilkeston, Derbyshire in England, used webcam trojans to capture sensitive information from the victim's computer. After that, he used this information to intimidate the teenage girls - his victims - forcing them to provide him with erotic images.

Adrian Ringland took the nickname 'Ant Jones' and participated in chat rooms to get to know the victims, then he sent you a picture that he had attached to malware, just click on the victim. This trojan is automatically enabled.

At the end of August, Adrian Ringland was forced by the British court to violate ethics and illegal computer acts. The victim of Adrian Ringland includes a 14-year-old Canadian student, 3 new English girls about 13.14 years old, and 3 other girls.

DUYLONG

You finished reading the article "Sophos alert for 'webcam trojans'" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.

