If you hate the slot on Apple's new iPhone X phone like everyone else, then this is good news for you. Apple has just approved an application called Notch Remover that appears on the App Store, which is very simple to cover this slot.

Although Apple, when making the groove design on its latest flagship phone, recommended developers to take advantage of this design and not cover it.

Do not cover or pay attention to key display features. Do not try to hide the rounded corners of the device, the sensor or indicator area to open the Home screen by placing black bars at the top and bottom of the screen.

Notch Remover does not remove him from the track, but only hides it by placing a black bar above the background. The result is a single status bar instead of being split into two and forming a rabbit ear above the Home screen and the lock screen of the iPhone X.

Before this app came out, Quantrimang also introduced you how to use the wallpaper to hide this track.

To use it every day, this trench doesn't matter, especially it costs 1000 dollars to experience how many features behind that track. But aesthetically, if you don't like the trench, then just give it a little more for a useless app to hide a stupid little problem.
