If you think that the feature to hide images from the timeline on Facebook will help your images be protected, you are wrong. Picturebook software (<http://getpicturebook.com/>), an extension for Chrome browser will help you see all the hidden images of a personal site (even for those who are not your friends on Facebook).

If there is a friend tag you into any photo, you can set that picture to disappear by selecting "Hide the timeline", but this only prevents others from viewing the picture on Your timeline (timeline), it is completely impossible to delete photos or block images in any case. If the person uploading that image has set the photo's privacy to be public, people can still view it.

Some other users may also find it on your timeline in a fairly simple way: search for it on the Graph Search search bar. Picturebook takes advantage of this gap to find all your photos even if you hide them.

With Picturebook, just one click you can see all the pictures of a personal page even if the person has hidden the picture. Of course, we do not encourage readers to take this action because no one should want their secret, private images to be widely available to many people.

So how to overcome this situation? The only way to completely hide your image from this tool is to manually remove your tag. First, click "Report / Delete Card" from an arrow menu next to the time of posting the photo, then select "I want to un-tag myself" and then press "Agree".

The above method will help remove the tag and will also prevent it from appearing on your timeline or on Picturebook. However, they will still appear on Facebook and only those who post it will be able to completely delete it.

If you're still worried about old photos showing up, you can review your own settings and make sure you only share what you want. Recent social networks have optimized privacy settings so that users can easily set up and install more according to their preferences.
