Kingley Vale National Nature Reserve in southern England is famous for its witch forest of nearly 1,000-year-old ancient pine trees full of mysterious and gruesome forms that frighten and curious people .

The pine trees in this forest are huge in size with extremely large branches, branches and roots. Make many people feel like entering the fairy forest, the residence of the dark witches.

In fact, Kingley Vale's witch forest is one of the largest and most wonderful evergreen forest in Western Europe.

Even some parts of the barwood here have a lifespan of over 1,000 years old.

The oddly shaped old pine cones with a twisted, distorted body, giant branches whirling into the ground like snakes, the roots sprouting up.

Under the shadow of the bizarre giant pine tree without any other vegetation, even grass cannot grow.

Spare parts usually have a lifespan of 400 to 600 years, but some plants can still live longer. The age of the bar parts is difficult to determine because the wood ring is unstable, and the body is still empty.

Pine trees have a special ability, when they encounter unfavorable conditions they can stop growing for centuries. Until the environment once again becomes adequate enough to awaken the tree, the pine tree will grow again.

The age of giant pine trees at Kingley Vale is difficult to determine, mainly due to speculation. According to legend, these trees have turned into pure wood, aged between 5,000 and 9500 years. But according to scientists that number is unrealistic.

According to legend, these pine trees were planted to commemorate the heroic war between the Vikings and Saxons Anglo in 859.

Currently, it is very difficult for us to admire the old pine trees like Kingley Vale. Because most of the ancient conifer trees throughout Europe were cut down after the 14th century when people liked the sticks made from straight grained barley wood, a kind of wood that was noticed by the royal family.
