Ding Wuling Village is located on a mountain in the old city of Chang Ding, Fujian Province, China

Arriving in Ding Wuling village, one cannot perceive that it is anything special compared to many other rural areas in China, still the low roofs behind the luxuriant green canopy. The atmosphere is fresh, cool and still. But for the past century, people have never seen the silhouette of mosquitoes.

Ding Wuling is located on a mountain, about 700m above sea level. Around the village are dense forests, luxuriant trees and very fresh air, airy. Even so, not even small corners of the bush in the village do not see mosquitoes.

Here visitors can not find the houses built of cement, all houses and structures in the village are built from mountain rocks. This village also preserves a lot of historical culture with yellow walls, black bricks, wooden houses, stone stairs .

For many years, generations of the village have been worshipping a toad-shaped rock at the top of the village. This toad-shaped rock turned its head towards the village. The villagers believe that it is the 'god toad' that helps the space here and clear mosquitoes.

Ding Wuling Village has a rock that resembles a toad.

Traditionally for thousands of years, generations in the village have been cleaning and cleaning the 'sacred toad' sacred stone together.

Ding Wuling villagers often collect waste and bury it on a hill. Many people believe that, from the habit of collecting garbage and burying it on the mountainside near the village to help this place clean, mosquitoes do not appear. Besides, Ding Wuling also attracts visitors thanks to its rich history of unique architecture and architecture and beautiful nature.

However, the story of 'toad god' chasing mosquitoes is still a story handed down in the folk. Ding Wuling villagers still hope that one day, experts will come here to find out the true cause of this strange phenomenon.
