

The whole world goes in to see all of Apple's new headquarters - this Apple Park

Matthew Roberts has posted a 4K tour video of the drone at Apple Park, the company's new headquarters in Cupertino, California.

Some Apple employees will begin to move to this new workplace in April, but the video shows that construction is still incomplete. A few bright spots are a close-up view of the main building, Steve Jobs Theater, and visitors from across the street and the whole scene.

Roberts also gave the unmanned aircraft flying over the historic location of Glendenning Barn, now carefully assembled by Apple after dismantling and moving to a new location due to the construction of Apple Park.

Glendenning Barn, a historic place in Cupertino, has been on Apple Park since the beginning of the 20th century. After acquiring the land that was originally HP's campus, Apple reported that it would dismantle the barn. This wood into pieces, each board, nail and crossbar, take very careful notes for construction.

The video recorded by the drone shows that Apple has successfully recreated this barn, although some boards seem a bit bright, indicating that it was not an old game. Apple has stockpiled wood from a small forest, in case it needs replacing.

When completed, Apple Park will have 9,000 trees and a large lake, walkways, seats and fitness center for employees.
