Microsoft has officially announced that the next Windows operating system will be called Windows 10, instead of 9 or Threshold.

Microsoft has officially announced that the next Windows operating system will be called Windows 10, instead of 9 or Threshold.

In its September 30 event, Microsoft acknowledged it would bring the name unity to any Windows-running device such as smartphones, tablets, laptops or computers. In other words, they will call the next Windows Phone operating system, Windows 10.

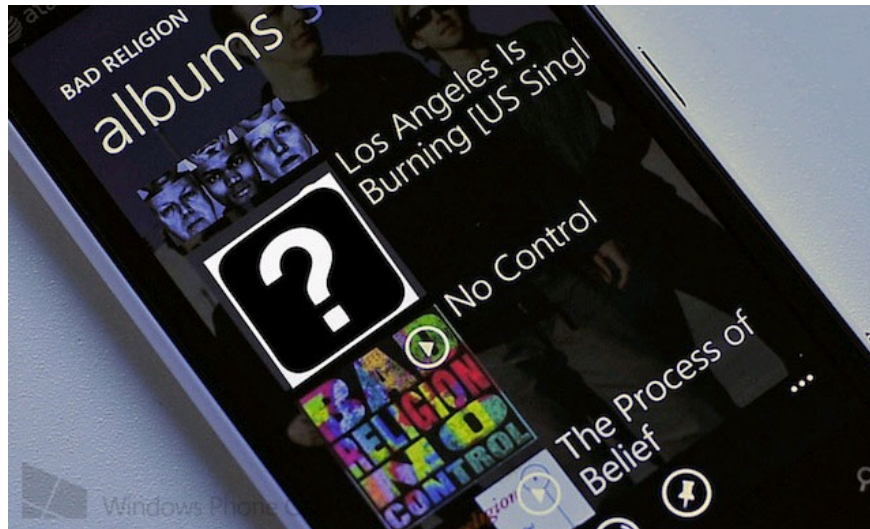

Windows 10 is a generic name

Besides, Microsoft also targets companies and promises that the new operating system will be compatible with management programs, and will allow users to separate personal and business data, customizing the Shop and even say they will create " the largest, bigger business platform ever ".

Although Microsoft has not stated how Windows 10 will create consistency between phones and computers, it seems that the interface is the first thing that Microsoft will change so that these devices look more similar and Application developers are more likely to create general applications.

Unfortunately, nothing has been said about Universal apps, but the company will talk more about this in April 2015. Everything everyone knows about Universal so far these applications are still will be able to run on the desktop and users will be able to run them in the window instead of full screen mode.

Will the Windows Phone name disappear?

Joe Belfiore, the head of the operating system, also spoke clearly about mixing user experience on personal computers and tablets. Therefore, it is possible that Windows smartphones will not be able to replace both tablets or computers but may work better with screens larger than 5 inches.
