

This phone is as small as a USB flash drive, but the battery lasts up to 7 days

UK-based technology company Zanco has created Tiny t2 - the 'smallest mobile phone in the world' - ready to call for investment on Kickstarter.

In the context of increasingly larger mobile phones, not even inferior to tablets to serve the entertainment needs, the UK-based technology company Zanco does not think so. They created Tiny t2 - the 'smallest mobile phone in the world' - ready to call for investment on Kickstarter.

In fact, this is not the first time Zanco has the idea to produce a micro phone. Earlier in 2017, the company also launched the Tiny t1 for $ 50, but has not achieved the success as expected. And in order not to follow the trail of Tiny t1, Zanco has added Tiny t2 some very noticeable changes.

Tiny t2 has an even smaller size than its predecessor, with 'measuring three rounds', which is 61mm high, 30mm wide, 16.5mm thick, and weighs only 31g. With such size, Tiny t2 is only equivalent to a large USB stick. However, there are still a lot of features packed into this compact chassis (mostly not in the first version), including 3G radio, 0.3 megapixel camera, Bluetooth connectivity, headphone jack 3.5mm, microSD card slot and 1 inch TFT screen. The phone even has several games pre-installed.

But above all, battery life is the most significant factor. Zanco said Tiny t2 can be used for up to 1 week on a single charge. Of course the phone does not support LTE connectivity or touch screen - factors that consume a lot of battery on smartphones.

The biggest weakness of Tiny t2 is that the keyboard is too small, making it difficult for people with big fingers to manipulate and input correctly. However, it is not a very serious problem because Zanco recommends that Tiny t2 will maximize its ability when used as a sub-machine, mainly used in specific situations such as during training. fitness, jog instead of a bulky smartphone, but still supports MP3 music and integrated radio.

Estimated selling price of the phone after its official launch is about 130 USD.

What do you think about the prospects of Tiny t2? Would you buy such a phone?
