The BivyPack 450g backpack is Flannery's dream item after more than a decade of relentless travel, and it really is a more compact, lighter and more refined item that easily turns into a sleeping tent. (sleeping bag) in a snap.

The new BivyPack backpack meets the criteria for air transport and includes appropriate sized external pockets that can hold things like water bottles and raincoats, which help the backpack's capacity up to 40 liters.

The outer surface is made of a hexagonal nylon mesh fabric, which is waterproof and durable, combined with a long cylindrical carbon fiber frame carefully arranged to create a breathable space between backpack and back wearer to avoid sweating. It is also equipped with adjustable hip and chest straps to disperse the heavy transmission force when hiking.

When you want to create a tent, the carbon fiber frame slides out and expands your backpack, which turns into tent corners on the sides where you will turn around. Special tent fabric to prevent rainwater (and insects). The top part also incorporates a net fabric to create a sense of airiness in the tent space.

The bivy tent is designed to be 2.6m x 70cm long. It can be suitable for people as tall as 198cm.

Flannery has put this tent-integrated backpack plan on Kickstarter site to call for $ 10,000 in funding for the production of this magical item, which now has $ 5,300.

One information shows that this backpack will cost $ 299 and sell in June if everything goes according to plan.
