

Trojan pretends to 'find a lover'

Experts from security firm Sophos have issued a warning to Internet users about a Trojan discovered on July 27, 2006, disguised as pictures of a Russian girl looking for love.

Experts from security firm Sophos have issued a warning to Internet users about a Trojan discovered on July 27, 2006, disguised as pictures of a Russian girl looking for love.

When activated by users, Troj / Keylog-HD will first display a slideshow of three different images named 'Victoria Stasova'. And when the pictures are being displayed, Troj / Keylog-HD will start recording everything users do on the keyboard, mouse or imported peripherals as soon as it is installed, then It will send all

This information to a remote server is controlled by an attacker.

Graham Cluley, Sophos senior technical consultant, said: ' The danger is that everyone thinks simply that it is the image of a beautiful Russian girl looking for her half. But behind that, important and secret information such as username and password will be stolen. One of the ways this malware approaches users is online chat. Users realize that they are chatting with someone who believes in 'virtual love' and then they will receive a photo slideshow. These love victims did not know that when they made a slideshow, it was possible that their pockets were being stolen . '

DUYLONG

You finished reading the article "Trojan pretends to 'find a lover'" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.

