

Using Japanese swords to slash Galaxy Note9 and iPhone Xs Max, the car almost crumbled, the broken screen of the device was intact

YouTube channel GizmoSlip decided to torture Apple's iPhone XS Max with a Japanese sword.

The Apple iPhone Xs / Xs Max duo has been officially launched from September 21, 2018. Shortly thereafter, YouTube channels quickly brought these expensive smartphones to participate in new challenges and tortures.

And YouTube channel GizmoSlip decided to torture Apple's iPhone Xs Max with a Japanese sword. This is probably one of the most difficult challenges of this smartphone. Apart from the iPhone Xs Max, Samsung's Galaxy Note9 is also 'invited' to participate in this challenge.

After the expensive test, the frame of the iPhone Xs Max was distorted and the screen almost crumbled. Meanwhile, the Galaxy Note9 only has a double screen broken, the remaining positions on the body still quite intact. The results can easily be realized that the iPhone Xs Max suffers more damage under the impact of the blade.

iPhone Xs Max after being slashed with Japanese swords.

Galaxy Note9 "body" after torture.

For more details about the process of fighting the Galaxy Note9 and iPhone XS Max duo with Japanese swords, please watch the video below. Note, this is a dangerous test, so you should not do it at home.

See more:

1. This is how this guy controls the iPhone with his eyes, not one touch
2. What happens when pouring molten salt into watermelon and cantaloupe?
3. Accumulated 1,000,000V directly to the device, Nokia "brick" fired lightning, self-dial as entered

You finished reading the article "Using Japanese swords to slash Galaxy Note9 and iPhone Xs Max, the car almost crumbled, the broken screen of the device was intact" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.
