

Valve is about to launch a new app that lets you play Steam games easily on Mobile

With Steam Link, users can experience Valve's Steam game library by streaming on Android and iOS devices such as phones, tablets and even TVs. This means you can play some PC games right on your phone and tablet.

Valve prepares to launch two new Steam Link and Steam Video applications for Android and iOS platforms to support stream next week. These two new applications are designed to extend access to its Steam service.

With Steam Link, users can experience Valve's Steam game library by streaming on Android and iOS devices such as phones, tablets and even TVs. This means you can play some PC games right on your phone and tablet.

But Steam Link only supports when users connect to a 5GHz Wi-Fi network or a wired connection to the main computer is Mac or PC. Therefore, if connected by mobile network, users will not be able to stream games to the phone, at least at this initial time.

Valve has yet to announce the operation of this revolutionary application as well as what games will be supported. The first Steam Link version will be released on Android first. Valve has also supported this feature on some Samsung smart TVs.

When Steam Link officially operates, it will support both Steam Controller, MFI-compatible gaming handles and many other devices on both platforms. But the user will use the bluetooth keyboard or touch control on the phone to experience mobile games, then wait until the application is released on May 21, we have the answer .

Steam Video is an application that allows users to watch thousands of movies and programs available on Steam from their Android and iOS devices on Wi-Fi or LTE. Similar to other services like Netflix or iFlix, with Steam Video users can also download movies to watch offline or stream live. Valve may release this application in late summer.
