Viber, a free messaging application and call, yesterday (May 7) officially released a version for Windows and Mac computers. The new version easily integrates with existing phone application versions and the installation process is as simple as using the phone number as the user ID.

With support for Windows and Mac computers, Viber is available in a total of 8 different platforms, including: Windows , Mac OS (computer), iOS , Android , Windows Phone , BlackBerry , Bada and the above operating system. Cheap phones from Nokia . With iOS and Android users, Viber has recently updated to version 3.0 to add many valuable additions such as: support video messages, improve call quality, can check the status of offline / online of an address, and in particular it is a complete change in the user interface.

For Viber for Windows and Mac, the application will have a number of similarities with Skype such as calling, video chatting, syncing messages across mobile devices running many different platforms. However, unlike Skype, Viber does not support group calls, or users cannot make video calls between phones and phones. However, now you can use your Windows desktop or Mac-based computers to phone relatives who are using Viber pre-installed smartphones.

Viber CEO, Talmon Marco said that Viber for Windows and Mac will help users to chat more easily, instead of typing on Qwerty virtual keyboard on a small screen of smartphones, now they You can chat directly via desktop or laptop, this is much more convenient.

On this occasion, Marco also revealed that Viber is focusing on developing Viber application for the BlackBerry 10 platform and soon, users of BB10 will get the best experience on Viber, similar to Viber on. Current iOS or Android.
