

Will Google Docs become the 'gut' app of every tablet?

The Google Docs online office suite is computer-friendly, and can become an indispensable application on tablets.

The Google Docs online office suite is computer-friendly, and can become an indispensable application on tablets.

Google has announced that its Google Docs online office suite will soon run on Android tablets and Apple iOS4 operating brands.

Google Docs is one of the most used online tools available today. It allows users to easily edit and edit documents easily through the web browser.

According to Google, its application is now ready to compete with iWork on the iPad - an app that is popular on Apple's app store.

It can be said that with the participation of Google Docs, 'Apple' product lovers will surely have more options for writing documents, using spreadsheets and presentations right on tablets. .

According to Dave Girouard, Google's business manager: 'We are demonstrating that Google Docs has good editing capabilities on mobile devices based on Android and iPad platforms. Maybe in the next few weeks, colleagues around the world will soon be able to use the Google Docs editor just like on a computer and allow editing large files, on many different devices.

Google Docs is now widely used on personal computers through a web browser with many new features, always improved and added by the company.

The current tablet models all have a moderate screen size and this is convenient for text editing or presentations wherever users want.

Currently Apple only sells iWorks software for iPad. This will also be a good opportunity for Google Docs to soon claim to be one of the best online office software tools available today when it can be deployed on many other hardware devices.

You finished reading the article "Will Google Docs become the 'gut' app of every tablet?" edited by the TipsMake team. We hope this article has provided you with many useful tech tips and tricks. You can search for similar articles on tips and guides. Thank you for reading and for following us regularly.