

Windows 11 with a completely new interface leaked before the launch date

Leaked images of Windows 11 give us a whole new look at the next version of Microsoft's operating system.

Recently, a series of leaked images of the successor version of Windows 10 - Windows 11 - have been officially revealed, giving us our first look at this new operating system from Microsoft.

These images are widely shared on Chinese social network Baidu, although it is not until June 24 that Microsoft will hold an event to launch the successor operating system version for Windows 10.

Even an ISO version for programmers is also passed on by users on the Internet.

Through the posted images, it can be seen that Windows 11 will have some interface changes, especially the Start Menu part.

Windows 11's Start Menu will have a bit of the direction of Windows 10X, a variant of Windows 10 but developed specifically for dual-screen devices. However, not long ago, Microsoft announced to stop developing Windows 10X to focus on developing Windows 10.

Windows 11 will now place icons on the Start Menu bar, including the Start button and the search button (Cortana) in the center, instead of on the left edge like on current versions of Windows.

However, Microsoft still allows users to customize the Start Menu to the left like Windows 10.
