It seems to have been a long time, but now YouTube for iOS has been updated to watch videos in the same way that users want: that is, displaying the entire screen and not having black stripes on either side. YouTube has announced plans to include this feature in August. Currently some people have used it, the rest will have to wait until the end of the week.

Whether you love or hate vertical videos, it is also a logical display on your phone because the phone is meant to be held vertically. Such a display also takes advantage of all the space on the screen.

Bye bye, black bars.
